RAZOR BLADES AND POT? HALLOWEEN MYTHS THE MEDIA LOVES TO SCARE US WITH

For many people, Halloween is the time of year when certain spooky myths and superstitions come alive. It's when we hear stories of black cats and bad luck or ghosts in the attic. But there are some recent myths that often get perpetuated by both mainstream and social media — stories that frighten parents and create an anxious, fearful atmosphere.

Razor Blades and Poison

For a long time, the "razor blades in candy" has been a go-to media story. Every year around Halloween, you're sure to see your local news running a segment that encourages parents to check their kids' candy for tampering so their children don't swallow razor blades or poison.

There have been zero substantiated cases of any child or parent finding a razor blade hidden in the chocolate and nougat. There has, however, been one lone case of a child being poisoned. In 1974, a father hid cyanide in his son's candy in Texas, leading to the child's death. It was discovered that the father was attempting to collect life insurance to ease his $100,000 debt.

THC

THC (tetrahydrocannabinol) is the primary psychoactive compound found in cannabis, and it's the chemical that makes people high. In more recent years, there have been an increasing number of stories spread on social media about THC-laced candy or edibles being found in kids' candy bags.

There are also news stories of THC-laced candy being found during warranted searches. However, that's as far as the story goes, at least when it comes to Halloween. In 2019, police in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, warned parents to be on the lookout for THC-laced candies after they found some in a bust. While the warning was certainly valid, nothing ever came of it.

Should you check your child's candy? Most definitely! It's always good to check just in case, though the danger is negligible. That said, kids should never take unwrapped or homemade treats while trick-or-treating. This has less to do with hidden razors and more to do with simply not knowing what's in those items, such as potential allergens.

GIVING OURSELVES ROOM TO GROW WHY WE'VE MOVED OUR MAIN OFFICE

Any parent will tell you that juggling a full-time job and being there for your kids in all the ways you want to can be hard. You have to make sacrifices, but you do it for those you love and what you love to do. For a long time, I made the decision to keep the Bolton Law Firm small so I could dedicate large amounts of time to my kids. Now that all of my children have left the nest except one, it's time to shift my focus to my firm, which means growing both our team and our office space.

It has been wonderful to spend so many years nurturing my children and helping them grow into the fantastic young adults they are today. As a mother, my goal was always to be there for my kids when they needed me, be it for school, sports, church, or other extracurricular activities. I wanted to play an active and available role in their lives. It's been so fulfilling to give them that time, even though it meant keeping my law firm small so my work was manageable.

When it comes to business, staying small has its sacrifices, too. It never felt good to turn away someone needing help with a legal problem, but the only way to give each of my clients the attention they deserved was to limit how many cases I accepted. Our firm's top priorities have always been our clients and obtaining the best possible results for them while ensuring their legal team addressed their concerns and questions through frequent communication. Those kinds of results, and that kind of relationship with clients, takes time, attention, and focus so we limited the number of clients we accepted.

During the last year, we've grown our team of talented legal experts so we can assist a wider pool of clients, and the last thing we needed to do to continue thriving was to give ourselves room to grow. That's why we sold the Tomball office where I had practiced for 25 years and opened a much larger main office in The Woodlands. We're thrilled to be back!

I say "back" because it's true; we have roots here in The Woodlands. Some of you may remember that in addition to the Tomball office, we had a second office in The Woodlands for many years. We made the tough decision to consolidate our office to Tomball exclusively for the last six years so I could eliminate the commuting time and not have to decline as many cases. Now that I have increased the size of our team, we are back in The Woodlands in full force, and we have an incredible, spacious new office space that can give our already thriving team the room it needs to succeed. We have the capacity to help more people than we ever have before, and it's exciting.

For everyone who has previously come to see us in our Tomball office, don't worry! Our roots there are too deep to dig up. I have a profound love for the Tomball community, and when my youngest finishes high school, four of my children will have graduated from Tomball High School. We have a second office less than a mile from where our previous office was located. If you are in Tomball and need our help, we can still accommodate you right in town. While our goal is to continue expanding, we'll make sure we're still there for the community that has supported us these last 25 years.

A big move like this means big changes, but big changes mean exciting opportunities. Our firm is growing in every sense of the word, and I am excited to help more people. I can't wait to see what the future holds.

CATCHPHRASE!

6 Things Celebrities Tried to Trademark — and Some Who Succeeded

Celebrities love to trademark all sorts of things for one simple reason: People associate certain words with the celebrity's brand, and the celebrity wants to protect that. It makes sense from a business perspective, but sometimes, it can get a little silly. Read on to see what the U.S. Trademark and Patent Office gave its blessing to and which trademarks it outright refused to create.

Blue Ivy Carter

Just days before their first daughter was born in 2012, Beyoncé and Jay-Z filed for a trademark on her name. The problem was that a wedding planning company called Blue Ivy was already using the name. Plus, Jay-Z mentioned to the media that their intention was to prevent others from using it. The trademark was denied.

Kylie

This generic trademark was filed by Kylie Jenner (of the Kardashians and Jenners). Her intention was to use her trademarked name for marketing purposes. The trademark was denied, and Jenner even ended up in a brief legal battle with singer Kylie Minogue.

'Let's get ready to rumble!'

One of the most well-known catchphrases of all time was successfully trademarked in 1992 by its creator, boxing announcer Michael Buffer. Even better, it's made Buffer a very wealthy man. To date, he has made nearly $500 million dollars by licensing the trademark.

'Rock Star From Mars'

Back in 2011, actor Charlie Sheen had a very public meltdown. During the episode, he rambled off countless phrases such as "Duh, winning," "tiger blood," and "rock star from Mars." In the end, he tried to trademark a total of 22 phrases, but all were rejected by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office.

'You're fired!'

Donald Trump is known for many things, including emblazoning his name on everything he owns. Long before he was president and while host of "The Apprentice," he filed a trademark on the show's catchphrase. It was denied because it was too close to a preexisting (and trademarked) board game called You're Hired.

'BAM!'

TV chef Emeril Lagasse was a pioneer in the world of cooking shows. He popularized cooking on TV and captivated audiences by exclaiming one simple phrase every time he added an ingredient to whatever he was making: "BAM!" Naturally, he trademarked his signature phrase, but he doesn't discourage people from using it as long as they keep it in the kitchen.

3 Great Apps to Maintain Your Mental Health at Home

When you lead a busy lifestyle, mental health often takes a back seat to other pressing matters. Thankfully, there are a number of easy-to-use apps to help address this concern. Even if you're pressed for time, these apps can help you maintain your mental health. And if you're just looking for some simple resources to guide you through mood-boosting exercises, they've got you covered there too.

Moodfit (GetMoodfit.com)

Think of this app as a fitness tracker for your mind. The mood tracker allows you to record your moods and thoughts and follow trends and changes over time. You can look at these trends yourself or set the app to monitor specific areas of your mood. This highly customizable app is packed with tools and resources to help you with your mental health. In addition to the mood tracker, Moodfit offers a range of breathing exercises and a guide to mindfulness meditation.

MoodMission (MoodMission.com)

If you're struggling with mental health issues, like anxiety and depression, you may feel like this free, evidence-based app was designed just for you. MoodMission asks you a series of questions to assess how you're feeling, then suggests a series of "missions" you can complete to help you get into a better state of mind. Missions are short, achievable tasks, like taking a walk around the block or cleaning up a room in your home. Of course, like all the apps listed here, it is not a replacement for professional mental health care, but it offers evidence-based exercises and a level of support that's not often found in smartphone apps.

Talkspace (Talkspace.com)

While this app contains a number of mental health tools, its primary purpose is to connect you quickly with one of the company's thousands of licensed and experienced therapists you can message on a regular basis. Unlike traditional therapy where you schedule an appointment and meet in person, Talkspace allows its user to communicate with their therapist through the app's encrypted messaging system. It also allows you to request a check-in from your therapist and provides a place for them to upload your therapy notes. Talkspace is more costly than some other apps, but depending on your specific needs, it may be worth it.

THE NIGHT MARTIANS INVADED NEW JERSEY

Orson Welles Recounts 'The War of the Worlds'

On the evening of Oct. 30, 1938, an eloquent voice graced the airwaves in New Jersey:

"We now know in the early years of the 20th century, this world was being watched closely by intelligences greater than man's, and yet as mortal as his own. We now know as human beings busied themselves about their various concerns, they were scrutinized and studied, perhaps almost as narrowly as a man with a microscope might scrutinize the transient creatures that swarm and multiply in a drop of water ..."

And so began Orson Welles' classic radio broadcast, a retelling of H.G. Wells' "The War of the Worlds." Peppered in the retelling were fictional news bulletins informing the public of an alien invasion. Martians had arrived in New Jersey!

Some listeners, who had missed the fact that this was a retelling of "The War of the Worlds," assumed the news bulletins were the real thing. Frenzied, they called local police, newspapers, and radio stations hoping for more information about the invasion. What were they supposed to do?

Higher-ups at the CBS radio studio where Welles delivered the live reading called and told him he needed to stop and remind listeners that this was a work of fiction. The panic, it seemed, was growing as the Martians "approached" New York. A little later that night, police showed up at the studio with the intent of shutting the whole thing down.

The next day, the story broke across the country — newspapers reported on mass hysteria and stories poured out that the nation had erupted in panic. However, as we now know, the extent of the panic was exaggerated. In fact, the program didn't even have very many listeners that night, and most who had tuned in were aware they were listening to a radio play rather than a news broadcast.

American University media historian W. Joseph Campbell, who researched the broadcast in the 2000s, found that while there had been some panic, most listeners simply enjoyed the show. It turns out the person who was the most frightened was Welles himself who thought his career had come to an end.
